Lucy- Executive Assistant at the Science Council

How I got here
I have done a variety of things since my A Levels. I spent three years “out” travelling, working in Australia and doing conservation work. I then took a degree in Geography at SOAS (in London) which then led to a job in Which? Magazine. I then did some volunteer work in South Africa, the largest travel bookshop in Europe, London Zoo, the Natural History Museum, and now I’m at the Science Council.

What my job entails
I assist the organisation in its internal communications, publicity and events. I work with experts, professional scientists and companies that utilise scientific learning.

How I use geographic skills
As a geographer I have developed strong analytical skills. I can look at things in a varied and open minded way and I come from a wide base appreciating the needs of various groups that work with the Science Council.

What I love about geography
It gives me the opportunity to look at the world around me in a different way to many people. I feel enthusiastic to go and see different places, and to find more about the world.
